American Indian Stories Zitkala-Sa 2015 In the early morning our simple breakfast was spread upon the grass west of our tepee. At the farthest point of the shade my mother sat beside her fire, toasting a savory piece of dried meat. Near her, I sat upon my feet, eating my dried meat with unleavened bread, and drinking strong black coffee. The morning meal was our quiet hour, when we two were entirely alone. At noon, several who chanced to be passing by stopped to rest, and to share our luncheon with us, for they were sure of our hospitality. My uncle, whose death my mother ever lamented, was one of our nation's bravest warriors. His name was on the lips of old men when talking of the proud feats of valor; and it was mentioned by younger men, too, in connection with deeds of gallantry. Old women praised him for his kindness toward them; young women held him up as an ideal to their sweethearts. Every one loved him, and my mother worshiped his memory. Thus it happened that even strangers were sure of welcome in our lodge, if they but asked a favor in my uncle's name. Though I heard many strange experiences related by these wayfarers, I loved best the evening meal, for that was the time old legends were told. I was always glad when the sun hung low in the west, for then my mother sent me to invite the neighboring old men and women to eat supper with us. Running all the way to the wigwams, I halted shyly at the entrances. Sometimes I stood long moments without saying a word. It was not any fear that made me so dumb when out upon such a happy errand; nor was it that I wished to withhold the invitation, for it was all I could do to observe this very proper silence. But it was a sensing of the atmosphere, to assure myself that I should not hinder other plans. My mother used to say to me, as I was almost bounding away for the old people: "Wait a moment before you invite any one. If other plans are being discussed, do not interfere, but go elsewhere." The old folks knew the meaning of my pauses; and often they coaxed my confidence by asking, "What do you seek, little granddaughter?"

Veho: the Love to Ride 2nd Gear Johnathon Martin 2016-08-27 A Special Thanks to Rick Bray of RKB Kustom Speed for allowing me access to his shop to photograph the process of his rolling artwork called "Deal Breaker." This photo book shows the progress and fabrication of Rick's custom one off build. RKB is located in Hanford, California, which is just south of Fresno. Rick has been building kustom made motorcycles for over the last decade, over the years he has grown in fame from doing the Discovery Channel show called #BikerLive and several motorcycle events and contests. Ricks build "One Piece at a

Time" won him the Central California edition of #BikerLive. The last 2 years Rick has put everything he has into creating some beautiful pieces of rolling art for the Las Vegas BikerFest, in which he had won but this year was his third year up and he wanted to win, which as never been done at the BikerFest. The "Deal Breaker" was a drag style inspired motorcycle with a forward slap shifter. Over the months RKB had its ups and downs but with some push from friends and family he was able to complete this build and even have it showcased before paint at a Sturgis motorcycle art show. Rick had his buddy and long time friend named Kool Hand Luke paint up all his bikes and this year he didn't disappoint as usual. Just check out the hard work, detail, and dedication that Rick puts into his work and builds. Watching it all start from a few pieces of piping and evolve into a kustom rolling piece of artwork was an incredible experience and one I had to document and share.
